Market development
Global equities were mostly positive in February, particularly in non-US developed markets. Investors continued to rotate out of high-flying US tech names and into other areas of the equity markets, including value stocks and overseas securities. The macroeconomic backdrop remained generally supportive, with stable growth and moderate levels of inflation. The US dollar rose during the month on higher-than-expected US producer price data.

Expectation of fund manager
Conflict in the Middle East adds to the already considerable geopolitical risk this year. And while the current global state of affairs is unsettling and volatility has increased, history suggests that events such as these have not necessarily led to a collapse in stock prices. Meanwhile, the growing divergence in performance between growth and value stocks is leading to a broader range of outcomes among sectors and securities, which is fertile ground for active, value-focused managers such as us.
